The carriage holds the recording head in an upright position at the start of recording or at the time of recovery from recording and is tilted at a right angle to the recording sheet at the end of recording or at the time of recovery from recording. With this arrangement, ink droplets are ejected in the direction perpendicular to the feeding direction of the recording sheet. Further, the carriage having the recording head is in contact with the recording sheet while recording and is pressed against the recording sheet, with the result that the recording sheet is easily damaged in the area where the contact occurs. To avoid the contact of the recording head with the recording sheet, Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No. 4-116461/1992, for example, discloses an ink-jet recording apparatus comprising a first platen having projections thereon arranged on the side in contact with a recording sheet, and a second platen provided in parallel to the first platen to position a recording sheet therebetween. With this arrangement, the first platen prevents the recording head from coming into direct contact with a recording sheet. The known ink-jet recording apparatus described above has the following problem. The ink-jet recording apparatus of the prior art, which is arranged as described above, can avoid damages to the recording sheet due to press contact of the recording head with the recording sheet. However, with the previously known ink-jet recording apparatus, the nozzles of the recording head are turned to the direction perpendicular to the feeding direction of the recording sheet. Therefore, an area of the recording sheet in which recording is not carried out is apt to
