Syria war: New secret detention centre used by Assad forces for chemical attack survivors in Aleppo's rebel-held east Four year-old Yahya al-Hamwi suffers from an irregular heartbeat as he comes out of one of the buildings in eastern Aleppo that was set up to receive people hurt in a recent government offensive Prisoners are kept inside for days without access to care, and some are later questioned by Syrian security services, say witnesses and opposition groups In a secret facility designed to torture and abuse detainees, a four-year-old boy is slowly dying as he waits to be dealt with by Syrian forces who left him in a building that was used as a prison during recent government offensives in Aleppo. Yahya al-Hamwi is being treated at the centre for patients with cardiac arrest who were killed or injured during recent bombardments, but his irregular heart beat has worsened and he is close to death. Among the injured people housed at the centre are women and children who have been subjected to systematic rapes by government forces since they crossed into the rebel-held areas of the city in October. Abdulrahman al-Mashi, spokesman for the Mwatana Organisation for Human Rights in Syria, said at least nine women have been raped inside the centre, which is located within the abandoned Red Crescent warehouse. Syrian army medic Susanna Abd al-Satar attends to a child after he fainted during a bombardment on the frontline area of Wadi al-Sheikh, a besieged area of the city He told MailOnline that at least three men have been kidnapped by the Syrian regime and are being held there, and have since disappeared. Syrian army medic Susanna Abd al-Satar, who works for the Syrian Civil Defence group known as the White Helmets, said that some prisoners have also been freed in the centre, and have said they have been abused by government forces. After attacking opposition-held districts in Aleppo, Syrian President Bashar al-Assad's forces have been reported to be holding women and children in dozens of detention centres across 570a42141b
