I remember hearing that bounty hunters had no guns in Colonial times, and later bounty hunters sometimes had guns in the "good old days". I'm not sure I heard anything more than that. This might seem like an extremely minor detail, but I have heard that setting a bounty was like you offered yourself up for execution, so I was wondering if there was any material out there in particular that either supports or denies that it was possible to hire bounty hunters to have guns. A: First of all, as noted in the comments, you should be aware that the term Bounty Hunters doesn't refer to the uniformed bounty hunters in the films, but to the men specifically employed by bounty hunters, who were typically ex-lawmen or ex-military men. As for the Bounty Hunters in the western, it was almost as diverse as that of the explorers. They had a lot of thing in common with those guys too: weapons were of poor quality, the most common sources of income were robberies, and they usually lost their targets. Again, the phrase "The Good Old Days" has to be taken with a grain of salt. As for now, only in fiction, it is the image of the "wild west". They did however have one important advantage: they had no guns. This isn't a hindrance when you are on horse, but it is when you are on foot, like when you are in a situation where you have to approach your target on foot. Also, bounty hunters are typically hired to chase their targets, not to catch them, which means that the weapons are usually not suitable to their task. An interesting fact
